Amid a steady rise in the number of children with complex health problems, a push is on to establish more full-fledged medical clinics within public schools and make the school nurse a more active participant in children's medicine.

In the past few years, school budget cuts have left students with a growing range of physical and mental health problems in the care of a shrinking number of nurses in many states. According to the National Association of School Nurses, just 45% of

Johnson & Johnson School Health Leadership Program

Children often turn to the school nurse when they feel sick or depressed. School nurses can build relationships with students unlike any other teacher, as they are trained to deal with health-related situations. Often, they are the first to recognize when a child is having an alcohol- or drug-related problem. For more than 20 years, this program has offered a training forum for school nurses on new alcohol and drug prevention techniques, mental health issues, obesity, and HIV/AIDS-prevention education plans. The Center of Alcohol Studies at Rutgers, the State University of New Jersey, manages the program.

- Publisher: Emerald Group Publishing Limited
- Abstract: Describes how school nurses estimated their goal attainment in view of the contents and methods of health counselling and their roles and possibilities as health promoters in the school community. Data were collected from the school nurses (n=31) of the Finnish European Network of Health-Promoting schools, using a semi-structured questionnaire specifically developed for the study. The response rate was 77 per cent (n=24). The results show that the traditional aspects of health counselling were mostly covered well. Counselling on sexual health was partly achieved well, but contraception and the prevention of sexually transmitted disease were less emphasised in school nurses' health counselling. To foster the empowerment of pupils, parents and teachers, there is a need for the school nurse to adopt a more active participatory role as a health promoter in the whole school community.
